

UNE updated its practice description on protection in Somalia cases

UNE updated its practice description* on protection in Somalia cases, covering several types of cases, including protection, expulsion and revocation. It also addresses certain issues related to the assessment of identity.

UNE's practice is that the general security situation in Somalia does not, in itself, entitle an applicant to protection. The security situation in northern Somalia has remained stable over time, while in southern and central Somalia it varies both over time and between areas. The need for protection is assessed on a case-by-case basis.

The risk of circumcision (female genital mutilation), forced marriage or forced recruitment by al-Shabaab are among the circumstances that may entitle a person to protection following an individual assessment. The practice description also discusses the importance of clan affiliation and networks upon return, as well as the possibility of internal displacement.

* Practice descriptions outline practice in specific areas and are prepared by UNE's case-handling units. They are intended for board chairs and board members and are published publicly so that others can also benefit from them.

Source(s)

- Immigration Appeals Board | Utlendingsnemnda (20 August, 2026), Oppdatert praksisbeskrivelse om beskyttelse i Somalia-saker [Updated practice description on protection in Somalia cases],
<https://www.une.no/aktuelt/arkiv/2026/oppdatert-praksisbeskrivelse-om-beskyttelse-i-somalia-saker/>

Date of development

20.08.2026

Country

Norway

Thematic area(s)

General asylum and migration development, First instance determination, Assessment of applications, Second instance determination

Development type

Practice